Christ The Eternal Tao

Downloaded from
www.everybodystreet.com
Christ The Eternal Tao by Kaiya & Nathen

CHRIST THE ETERNAL TAO: WHERE ANCIENT WISDOM MEETS DIVINE REVELATION

In a world increasingly fragmented by ideological divides, there is a growing hunger for spiritual frameworks that honor both reason and mystery, structure and flow, the personal and the transcendent. Few concepts bridge these divides as elegantly as the idea of Christ The Eternal Tao. This profound synthesis, most famously articulated by Hieromonk Damascene in his seminal work of the same name, offers a meeting point between the ancient, intuitive wisdom of the East and the definitive, historical revelation of the West. It is not a syncretic blurring of traditions, but rather a recognition that the Universal Logos—the Word made flesh in Jesus Christ—is the very same cosmic principle that Lao Tzu described as the Tao more than five hundred years before the Incarnation. This article explores the depths of this convergence, unpacking its theological, philosophical, and practical implications for the modern seeker.

THE CONCEPT OF THE TAO IN ANCIENT CHINESE PHILOSOPHY

To understand the power of Christ The Eternal Tao, we must first appreciate the concept of the Tao itself. In Chinese philosophy, particularly within Taoism as outlined in the Tao Te Ching, the Tao (道) is the ultimate, nameless, and ineffable source of all existence. It is not a god in the personal, Western sense, nor is it a mere abstraction. The Tao is the Way—the natural, unforced order of the universe. Lao Tzu opens his classic text with the famous lines: "The Tao that can be told is not the eternal Tao. The name that can be named is not the eternal Name."

This points to a fundamental truth found in many mystical traditions: ultimate reality transcends human categories and linguistic constructs. The Tao is simultaneously empty and full, silent yet creative. It is the primordial unity from which Yin and Yang—the complementary forces of nature—emerge. Taoist spirituality is therefore a path of alignment. The goal is not to conquer or control, but to flow with Christ The Eternal Tao (or simply the Tao) by cultivating wu wei (effortless action), simplicity, humility, and compassion. The sage, in Taoist thought, is one who has emptied themselves of ego and become a transparent vessel for the Tao's action.

The Limitations of a Impersonal Tao

While the Taoist vision is beautiful and deeply resonant, it leaves a crucial question unanswered: can the Tao love? Can the Tao relate? For millions of years, humanity has yearned not just for cosmic harmony, but for a personal connection with the source of being. The Tao, as described by Lao Tzu, operates with a kind of impersonal, benevolent neutrality. It does not speak, it does not suffer, and it does not enter into history. This is where the Christian revelation provides a stunning complement. The concept of Christ The Eternal Tao proposes that the impersonal ground of being has a personal face.

THE LOGOS: THE CHRISTIAN PARALLEL TO THE TAO

When the Apostle John begins his Gospel with "In the beginning was the Word (Logos), and the Word was with God, and the Word was God," he is writing within a Hellenistic context. However, the term Logos carries profound resonance with the Tao. Just as the Tao is the principle of order and reason behind the universe, the Logos is the divine reason through whom all things were made. John explicitly connects this cosmic principle to a specific, historical person: Jesus of Nazareth. "And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us" (John 1:14).

Christ The Eternal Tao is not just a poetic analogy; it is a theological claim. The claim is that the same ultimate reality that Lao Tzu intuited as the nameless, formless Tao is the same reality that Christians know as the Second Person of the Trinity. The ancient Chinese sages, through their deep contemplation of nature and the human condition, pierced the veil and saw the outline of the truth. They saw the pattern of the Way. But what they could not see, because it had not yet happened in history, was the incarnation. They saw the blueprint, but not the Carpenter.

KEY PARALLELS BETWEEN THE TAO TE CHING AND THE GOSPEL

One of the most compelling aspects of the Christ The Eternal Tao thesis is the stunning number of parallels between the Tao Te Ching and the teachings of Jesus, as recorded in the Gospels. These are not superficial similarities; they touch on the very essence of spiritual transformation.

The Exaltation of Humility

Lao Tzu writes: "The highest goodness is like water. Water benefits all things and does not compete." Jesus, in turn, washes the feet of his disciples and teaches, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Both traditions reject the world's obsession with power, status, and aggression. The Way is the path of descent, not ascent. Christ The Eternal Tao exemplifies this perfectly: the Creator of the cosmos empties Himself to become a servant.

Non-Resistance and Returning Good for Evil

The Tao Te Ching advises: "Recompense injury with kindness." This is strikingly similar to Jesus's command in the Sermon on the Mount: "Love your enemies, bless those who curse you, do good to those who hate you." Both point to a radical transcendence of the cycle of revenge. This is not weakness; it is the strength of the Tao, which overcomes hardness with softness, evil with goodness.

The Paradox of Strength in Weakness

A core theme in both traditions is that true strength is found in apparent weakness. Lao Tzu observes: "The stiff and unbending is the disciple of death. The gentle and yielding is the disciple of life." The Cross of Christ is the ultimate expression of this paradox. On the surface, it is a total defeat—a man stripped, tortured, and killed. But in the logic of Christ The Eternal Tao, this apparent defeat is the victory that conquers death itself. The Cross is the axis of the world, the point where weakness becomes the conduit for divine power.

THEOSIS AND THE RETURN TO THE WAY

In Orthodox Christian theology, the goal of the spiritual life is theosis—deification, or becoming a partaker of the divine nature. This is not becoming God in essence, but being so fully united to God's energies that we shine with His light. This concept maps beautifully onto the Taoist goal of returning to the Tao. The Taoist sage seeks to strip away the artificial layers of ego, desire, and social conditioning to return to the simple, natural state of alignment with the Way.

In the Christian framework, this stripping away is called kenosis (self-emptying). As Saint Paul writes, "Have this mind in you, which was also in Christ Jesus, who, being in the form of God, did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied Himself." The path of Christ The Eternal Tao is thus a path of simultaneous emptying and filling. We empty ourselves of pride, fear, and self-will so that we can be filled with the divine Life, which is the very energy of the Tao made accessible through Christ and the Holy Spirit.

PRACTICAL IMPLICATIONS FOR THE MODERN SEEKER

The synthesis of Christ The Eternal Tao is not merely an academic exercise. It has profound practical implications for how we live our daily lives.

- Contemplative Prayer: The Taoist practice of stillness and silence finds a deep home in Christian Hesychasm (the practice of inner stillness). The Jesus Prayer—"Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me, a sinner"—becomes a rhythmic, flow-like repetition that aligns the heart with the divine Tao.
- Simplicity of Life: Both paths call us away from the frantic accumulation of possessions and status. The Taoist advocates for frugality and contentment. Christ calls us to consider the lilies of the field, who neither toil nor spin. Adopting a life oriented around Christ The Eternal Tao means prioritizing being over having, and presence over productivity.
- Compassionate Action: The Tao Te Ching emphasizes kindness, especially to the humble and lowly. Christ explicitly identifies with the "least of these"—the hungry, the stranger, the prisoner. Walking the Way means seeing the face of the Tao in every person we meet and serving them.

- Trust in Providence: Taoism teaches a deep trust in the natural order of the Tao. Christianity teaches a deep trust in the providence of a loving Father. Both oppose the anxious striving of the ego. To embrace Christ The Eternal Tao is to release our grip on controlling outcomes and trust that the current of the Way is, ultimately, carrying us toward life.

ADDRESSING POTENTIAL CONCERNS AND CRITICISMS

Some critics worry that the Christ The Eternal Tao framework is a form of religious syncretism that dilutes the uniqueness of Christ. This is a valid concern. However, proponents argue that this is not syncretism (mixing religions into a new blend) but rather a recapitulation or fulfillment model. Just as Saint Paul used Greek philosophical terms like Logos to communicate the Gospel to the Hellenistic world, so too can the concept of the Tao serve as a bridge for communicating the Gospel to the Eastern mind.

The claim is not that Christ is just one more example of a universal archetype. The claim is that Christ is the universal Archetype—the Eternal Tao—who entered history in a unique and unrepeatable way. The Taoist texts are seen as a kind of Old Testament of the East, containing wisdom that prepares the heart for the fullness of revelation. This approach does not diminish Christ; it magnifies Him by showing that all true wisdom, wherever it is found, flows from Him and points back to Him.

CONCLUSION: THE WAY THAT HAS A NAME

Ultimately, the mystery of Christ The Eternal Tao invites us into a deeper, richer spiritual life. It honors the ancient intuition that there is a Way, a Path, a River of being that flows through all things. But it goes further by declaring that this River has a mouth that speaks, hands that heal, and a heart that loves. Lao Tzu taught that the Tao that can be named is not the eternal Tao. But in the Christian understanding, the Eternal Tao has chosen to take a name—the name of Jesus—so that we, who are bound by language and history, might know Him personally.

The quiet flow of the Tao and the fiery love of the Incarnate Word are not opposites. They are the same divine reality seen from different angles. For those willing to walk the path, the ancient Chinese sages and the Christian saints point to the same destination: a life of humility, compassion, and union with the Source of all that is. The journey is long, but the Way is clear. It is the way of the Cross, the way of the Water, the way of the Child. It is the way of Christ The Eternal Tao.